Abstract

This study aims to investigate similarities and differences in bound morphemes in English language and Bedauyet language. The study adopted the descriptive analytical method. The population of the study is Bedauyet native speakers who are professionals in English language. The sample of the study is ten English language teachers who are professional in both languages. The study came to the findings that Bedauyet suffix-bound morphemes change according to the gender, tenses and number unlike English language bound morphemes. On the basis of finding recommendations were done.
